Microtubules and microtubule-associated proteins form a dynamic and efficient intracellular transport system. Microtubules are composed of tubulin subunits that assemble into protofilaments, which then form microtubules. Microtubule-associated proteins (MAPs) bind to microtubules and regulate their function. MAPs are involved in a variety of cellular processes, including cell division, cell migration, and organelle movement. The dynamic nature of microtubules allows them to respond to changes in the cell environment and to transport cargo to specific locations within the cell.
